The Creative Economy in U.S. Metros

Arts and Design sectors are gaining importance in regional economies

In this brief we examine recent employment growth and concentration data in 381 U.S. metropolitan areas related to the four key sectors that comprise much of the country's creative economy.

In most cities and metro areas, role of the arts and the creative economy has been given little, if any, attention in relation to business targeting and economic growth strategies. Even in many communities that do embrace the importance the creative economy, it is viewed more as a quality of place enhancement than as a core piece of economic development programs. This view overlooks the importance of the jobs and earnings that comprise these sectors.

While the exact definition of the creative economy is difficult to pin down, a recent review of several local and regional studies¹ concluded that certain sectors appeared in the vast majority of research. Among four-digit NAICS categories, there were four sectors that were particularly prominent:

- NAICS 5121: Motion Picture & Video Industries
- NAICS 5414: Specialized Design Services
- NAICS 7111: Performing Arts Companies
- NAICS 7115: Independent Artists, Writers & Performers

These four sectors alone account for about 1.2 million jobs across the U.S. (including self-employment), with average annual earnings of $56,000. Employment in these sectors has increased by 10.6% over the past five years, with particularly strong growth for Specialized Design Services and Motion Picture & Video Industries, as shown below.

Among the 381 metropolitan areas in the U.S., employment growth in these sectors has exceeded 30% in 54 regions. While the rapid growth in many areas is mainly a function of a very small sector, other larger metro areas have seen very strong growth in these sectors for a variety of reasons. In Canton, OH, there has been strong growth in the Specialized Design Services sector, related to the resurgence of the area's automobile industry. In many communities including Baton Rouge, LA, Savannah, GA, Trenton, NJ, Portland, OR and New Orleans, LA, there has been rapid expansion in the motion picture and television industries. University-oriented communities such as Austin, TX, Lawrence, KS, and Durham, NC have built on their strong bases of cultural activity.

Although there has been strong growth in many regions, two metro areas continue to dominate the U.S. creative economy: Los Angeles and New York. With 219,000 jobs in these four sectors, the Los Angeles metro area alone accounts for 19% of all creative jobs in the U.S. Los Angeles' dominance is not restricted to the motion picture and TV industry – while the region does have a very high location quotient (LQ)² of 7.48 in this sector, it also has high concentrations of independent artists, writers, and performers (LQ of 3.34) and of specialized design services (LQ of 2.07). New York has about 150,000 jobs in creative sectors, and its greatest concentration is for performing arts companies (LQ of 2.49). No other metro area has more than 35,000 jobs in these sectors.

Despite the dominance of these two markets, there are several smaller metro areas with strong creative economies as well. Among the 15 metro areas with the highest average location quotient in these sectors, nine are smaller areas with well-established arts communities. These include: Kahului-Wailuku-Lahaina, HI (Maui); Santa Fe, NM; North Port-Sarasota-Bradenton, FL; Medford, OR; and Kingston, NY. Among the 15 metros with the greatest concentrations in creative sectors, employment has increased in ² A location quotient (LQ) is the measure of how concentrated a particular industry is in a particular region relative to national averages. If a given industry represents 5.0% percent jobs in the national economy and 10% of jobs in the region, that region's LQ would be 2.00.

The remaining larger metro areas in terms of the concentration of creative employment include Nashville, which is well known as the capital of the country music industry; San Francisco and Portland, which are heavily concentrated in specialized design services; and Las Vegas, which is dominated by the performing arts sector.

A full listing of employment, employment change, and location quotients for all U.S. metro areas is provided beginning on the next page. We encourage economic development professionals to take a close look at this information to understand how your area ranks relative to other regions in terms of supporting the creative economy. The role of these sectors has become an increasingly important element of the psychology behind the locational decisions of companies.
